

Not bad at all. I can see the clear progression of your thoughts. You should be careful not to assume that the reader knows what you are talking about and take more pains in making the subject of your sentences clear and making sure following sentences flow with the ones before. Your thesis is a bit drastic: "the inevitable conflict(not conflicting) of perspectives prohibits science and religion to coexist" They have co-existed for quite sometime now, perhaps not peacefully, but its coexistence none the less.

"as a means of denying the validity of a hypothesis illustrates a significant reason why religion and science are irreconcilable."

- science denies the validity of hypothesis' all the time. I think the problem is when religion denies something that's not a hypothesis. Also be careful because the evidence you use for this is the guy saying that we should think about other things. That doesn't really discredit the hypothesis it just says knowing would be useless. There are other things the church said that would help you better here.

Note that religion does use some kind of evidence. Its just not based on anything that can be measured. However their claims are backed by the bible.

Second page, first paragraph, second and third sentence:
Too much repetition.

End of the paragraph: "both of which we non-scientific expeditions" what does this mean?

Third page end of continued paragraph: "the later will be discussed first..."
You don't need this at all.

First full paragraph: You should tie this in better to your thesis. Right now it just shows what he thinks of religion, not how religion and science cannot exist together. If you perhaps show that a scientist thinks it inconsistent with science to believe religion that would be stronger.

Last page, first continuing paragraph: "prevented the church from..."
The church did have an argument for quite some time, it just fell apart.

"the church made to Galileo to recant his discoveries" clarity

And your conclusion is kind of weak right now. Don't just restate your introduction. Elaborate on it.
